Introduction

Customer service representatives who are assigned to handle complaints need to be patient, articulate and able to balance fairly the interests of the company with those of the customers. They also should be able to communicate legitimate consumer complaints to management to help determine whether there is a need for changes in company policies or procedures.

All staff dealing with complaints should be familiar with the operations of the company and with its products and services. Prior experience in other departments may be an asset. Training can strengthen interviewing and communications skills and heighten the staff's awareness of the special needs of customers from different personality profiling, cultural, economic or educational backgrounds.

Why is complaint handling important?

Careful complaint management can save business unwanted costs. For example, negative word-of-mouth publicity from dissatisfied consumers means lost revenue and necessitates additional investment in advertising to attract replacement customers.

Complaints and complaint trends tell business how to do its job better by alerting management to problems that need prompt attention and correction. Furthermore, they indicate long-range opportunities for product innovation and problem prevention.

A well-planned system for screening and recording complaint data can provide business owners and managers answers to such important questions as the following:

- Are products or services "oversold" or "over advertised?"
- Is advertising clearly understood?
- Are salespeople overzealous?
- Are user's manuals clear, complete and easy-to-read?
- Would changing warranty coverage reduce complaints?

Complaints also provide information about products or services quality:

- Are there opportunities for product improvements or better quality control?
- Are there indications of safety defects that should be reported and corrected, or that justify a recall?
